

WILLIAM AOYAMA

I really respect my members and how we are compensate each other.

William was born in California and came to Japan at the age of two. Since then he “spent all my time practicing to go to Junior Olympics in swimming.” At the age of fourteen, he was scouted to the entertainment business and it was then when William really began to work on his music. He has a unique style of expressing and communicating, and his thoughts are not simple. In that sense William is very artistic and possess the talent to accompany that characteristic. William has high skill as a vocalist whilst also writing songs for the group, and is getting much respect from other members.

“I was serious about swimming, and it taught me countless things like concentration and setback while heading to the goal. That experience is helping me in songwriting.” says William whose music is deepened by a sense of sadness. Since he began writing songs for the group, William started to listen to broader range from R&B to classic in order to bring in the favorite taste of other members.

When asked the role within the group, William answered “ the one to pick up something that came falling down, the one to solidify the melting ice” with his unique expression. It seems to mean someone who compensate what is missing, like singing the high note that others cannot. “At first I felt I wouldn’t get along with other members, but now I really respect them and we are compensating each other.” Because William’s thoughts are different from other people, it may take time for him to be understood. But once he opens his heart, William is a very loving man.

“Both my strength and weakness is that I’m a big thinker. I usually think of so many things that my head even gets tired.” William says he wants to be a ‘mature person’ but on the other hand, he says “I think it’s sad when people grow up and experience many things and their innocence and passion is lost.” Contrary of his sweet looks, he possess a sense of emptiness towards being unanswered and has a great desire for love, which lead to sad experience in his past relationships. William seems to be awkward and relatable as well.
